

AN OFFICER AND A GENTLEMAN

By Charles Francis Bourke

Drawings by M. Leone Bracker

Two Goggling White Eyes
G'ared Into His Own.

THE third week of Somers' exile on the island opened under a tropical sun which blazed on the white beach sands with the glare of a ship's furnaces. Other days had been hot; but this was menacing and unnatural.

Macaws and parakeets perched in sulky silence in the woods; out on the coral reef seagulls squatted with outspread wings; even sharks in the lagoon sought the deeper water of the ocean which stretched away like a sea of ground glass into the haze of the South Pacific. To Lieutenant George Somers, mechanically rolling a cigarette in the shade of the solitary beach palm, the weather signs were ominous of trouble to come, and brought a vivid realization of his own precarious position and the promise of the immediate future.

"Marooned in the Sulu Sea, with a monsoon nosing the reef and getting ready to smash things generally, and close navigation! A fine finish for an officer and a gentleman after six years' service in the Philippine navy! If I had my choice of berths over again, I'd take a warship's stokehole. It couldn't be hotter, nor half so tiresome as waiting for a wandering pearl pirate to happen along and take me off the beach. It is hard on a fellow's nerves."

Since that memorable morning, when a silent, sullen faced boat's crew landed him from the cruiser Buffalo on the narrow ribbon of sand, Lieutenant Somers had not seen a human face, and had sighted only one ship, a slate colored British gunboat, prowling among the islands after castaways or contraband schooners hiding from naval law in the tortuous channels of the Sulu Archipelago.

While the gunboat was in range of his binoculars, the marooned man lay behind a sand dune; when she went wallowing on her way south, reeling under her deckload of steel tubes, Somers resumed his patrol of the beach and the channel that paralleled it, with the same stolid devotion to routine work he had set himself to do which had made him noted formerly as the crack duty man of the United States cruiser Buffalo, a disciplinarian who could always be depended upon to carry out orders regardless of consequences to himself or others.

That was in the past, when Lieutenant Somers wore service stars and brass buttons on his uniform coat. Now the whole expanse of Mindoro Sea lay between him and the Philippine mainland, and at that moment the officer's thoughts were entirely apart from monsoons and maroonings.

"I wonder what Maida Williams is doing in little old Manila?" Somers' fancy pictured the slender, pretty girl who had come to mean so much in his life, during the languorous lazy days in Manila. He felt again the soft touch of her hand, and heard the musical cadences of her voice as she answered the momentous question he had put to her that last night ashore.

"If I ever do get away from this confounded place and the little girl is waiting for me, as she promised she would—Heavens! I never thought of that! Oh, poor Maida!" A sudden disturbing recollection made him turn pale under his island tan.

"I never had time to write her before I left the ship for this place. And some fellow is sure to cook up the very worst construction of what has happened to me. Everybody aboard ship knows the story." He winced with pity for the heartache that must have come to her.

"She'll think me a heartless scamp," he growled, gritting his teeth as he looked down at the front of his braid-bound fatigue jacket, shorn of its shining buttons and held together only by a brace of safety pins. A sympathetic hospital steward had slipped him those overgrown cot pins just before he went over the side, with the sailors lined up on deck and the drums of the ship beating a tattoo. Somers pulled himself together, dismissing his disturbing thoughts with a savage shake of his head.

"Well, it's too late now to remedy things. It's what a fellow gets for going sailing in Uncle Sam's sea police. Just the same, I'll make Master Dane Thorsen squirm for this, if ever he drops into this neck of the woods! And that's what he'll do as soon as he gets word of why I'm here, or I miss my guess. I'll make terms with Mr. Thorsen, all right, if I get a chance!"

HE stopped, his jaw squaring, his figure tense, as he stared down the shore. Far to the southward, down the white ribbon of beach, where the imminent reef channel rounded a wooded promontory, something still whiter was forging its way slowly into the stream. Somers jerked his binoculars from the case slung from his shoulder and trained the glasses on the moving object.

"Speaking of pearl pirates, that's a schooner down there, all right, neat little black fore and aft wind jammer. She's working up channel against the tide and the wind. Jove! I'd know that clean cut black hull in the middle of the Sahara desert! It's the Fleetwing, and that means Dane Thorsen! I knew it! I knew he would come through this way!" Somers' tone was exultant.

Lieutenant George Somers had reason indeed to know the schooner Fleetwing, and her master Dane Thorsen, free trader, smuggler, looter of industrious pearl fishers, and, even worse, a man who had set the Philippine revenue service at defiance and led the old cruiser Buffalo many a merry chase through the islands of the archipelago. Somers smiled as he thought of the absent warship and the prey so close at hand.

"I'll bet the pirate's got a hold full of looted pearl shell and a ton of copra piled on top for a blind! He's fixing to sneak through the back waters of the islands and make a break across sea to the Philippine coast. Just the same, I'll take a chance of boarding you, my friend, whether you want me or not. What's he up to now?"

Even in the distance he could make out the giant figure of a man aloft in the crosstrees, overlooking the waters and picking a passage for the little schooner through the coral rocks that strewed the entrance of the channel. When she was fairly in the mouth of the channel the schooner swung up into the wind, the lookout clawed his way down the shrouds, and the head sails were lowered with a rush. Somers drew a breath of relief.

"He's going to anchor where he is till the tide turns—where he can turn tail and run out if a gunboat shows up. Catch Captain Thorsen napping! There goes his whaleboat over the side; he's coming ashore, four Fiji oarsmen and a cute little cox in white ducks. Captain Dane Thorsen does things in style!"

He snapped his binocular case, picked up a light sporting rifle from its resting place at the foot of the palm tree, and started for the lagoon. From the nearby woods came the chatter of a macaw, hardly a pistol shot away. Somers glanced into the bushes and checked an exclamation of surprise.

"Curious, that! I don't recollect seeing a macaw with the plumage of a scarlet tanager before. By George! that's a Malay headdress, half a dozen of 'em! The Moros wear white. Those fellows must have landed on the other side of the island and crossed over to see what trouble they could pick up. And a little while ago I was praying for action!"

HE broke off, swerving toward the water's edge, making for a little hillock of sand. In the bushes, the gaudy native headdresses, with the sun glinting from as many polished spears, spread out before and behind him. Involuntarily Somers' hand dropped to his jacket pocket and he swore softly.

"Three cartridges! And a single barreled popgun rifle that wouldn't kill a rabbit, let alone those beggars in the bushes! Ah! would you, my friend?"

A spear whizzed over his head, a brown body incautiously showed itself in the bushes, and the little rifle cracked spitefully. Somers dropped down behind his protecting sand heap as a chorus of derisive yells greeted the shot.

"I might know it wouldn't carry. Oh, for a machine gun from the old Buffalo and a hopper of .44's! You'd sing a different tune, my high and mighty Malay gentlemen! Ah, here they come, creeses and all! Now for the chop suey!"

He jerked out the empty shell and shoved another tiny cartridge into place. The natives were in plain sight now, openly contemptuous of the puny rifle. Suddenly half a dozen men bunched together and sped across the beach with a shout. Somers fired into the thick of them and ducked instinctively before the poised native spears.

At the same moment the whining crack of a rifle came from the lagoon, the storming party took to their heels, and a big red bearded man splashed across the shallow indentation and plumped himself down at Somers' side.

REINFORCEMENTS arrived just in time, I imagine," he panted. "I'd have got that tall chap in the motor centers, if he hadn't jumped and bolted. Ah, they're all levanting!" The heavy rifle spoke twice in quick succession, and the big man chuckled. "Guess they didn't expect such a warm reception, eh, Lieutenant?"

In the surprise of the moment Somers had not spoken or moved except to stare moodily at the red bearded giant who had so unexpectedly fallen into the breach. But when the rescuer casually gave him his rank, he started and shifted his gaze to the keen gray eyes which looked down into his own. Somers had seen Dane Thorsen aforetime, and Thorsen was not a man to be forgotten.

"You know me, Lieutenant, I see," the big man said pleasantly. "We had a little dispute on the coast once, I believe, a cutting out party, or something of the sort."

Somers remembered that cutting out expedition, an attempt to capture the freebooter's schooner which had cost him a run-down boat's crew and a tongue lashing from the commander of the Buffalo. And the man he was after then was this same viking with the flaming beard, who smiled down at him, as he nursed his murderous looking Winchester, with a furtive eye on the woods. And he, Lieutenant George Somers, U. S. N., "an officer and a gentleman," owed his life to this renegade of the ocean! The thought cut him to the quick and roused all his resentment.

The big schooner master watched him, with his cold sailor's eyes screwed up to pin points, as though reading the young officer's inmost thoughts.

"The unexpected always happens, Lieutenant Somers," he said with a smile that showed all his big white teeth. "Besides, birds of a feather flock together, you know. I happened to hear your shot down shore; so I investigated."

Somers flushed angrily under his bronze coating at the classification. "You've heard—what happened to me, then?"

Thorsen gave a contemptuous grunt. "You're posted all over the islands. The Buffalo took precious good care of that! The whole coast knows that Lieutenant George Somers abandoned his men under Moro fire, was court martialed, dismissed his ship, and put ashore on a Sulu island. Remarkable leniency, I call that. Of course you had your own plans for the future not contemplated in navy regulations."

"I'd be an invaluable acquisition to any man who wanted to dodge the United States navy," Somers retorted grimly.

"That's exactly why I looked you up," Thorsen said coolly. "I want a mate who knows every ship and launch in the navy as far as a glass can raise her."

The two men looked understandingly at each other for an instant.

"When do you sail?" Somers sprang to his feet, with a defiant glance at the big form towering over him.

"Well, I'm not strictly on business now," Thorsen said slowly. "No pearl shell, no copra, nothing contraband. Fact is, I'm crossing to Jolo to catch the Borneo steamer. Sending my daughter back to Manila."

"Your daughter?"

"H'm." Thorsen's gaze was fixed on the channel in the direction where his boat lay out of sight inshore. Somers could almost see the gray eyes soften. "And, Lieutenant," he said, "if you come aboard, I'm Captain John Williams, in the copra trade. Maida mustn't know what blackguards we are—a free trader and a disgraced navy policeman!"

"Maida! Maida Williams your daughter?"

The insult passed unheeded. The monsoon of fate had completed the cycle and struck Somers again, this time fairly between the eyes. Thorsen's big hand fell on his shoulder.

"You met her in Manila, you mean? That won't matter. Maida knows all about you, now."

The second deliberate insult was harder to bear; but Somers had no mind for resentment. In the tumult of unexpected events he struggled to grasp the full tragedy of his position. He was not now in a position to make terms with Thorsen or to make his peace with Thorsen's daughter, whose former confidences concerning her father, a "merchant in the copra trade," were now so fully explained.

SOMERS checked a groan which was capped by a hoarse shout from his companion.

"Name of Heaven! Look yonder!" Thorsen's deep voice trembled. He was glaring down shore with a face gone suddenly gray.

Following the man's startled gaze, Somers saw the whaleboat pulling away from the shore, making for the schooner. In her wake, a cable's length away, followed a Malay proa crowded with red capped men, also making for the anchored craft in midchannel.

The whaleboat reached the schooner and hung for a moment on her bows, while the Fiji sailors on deck tumbled over the rail in a panic. Then, steered by the little coxswain in white, the boat shot up stream. A spear, thrown from the proa after the retreating whaleboat, flashed into the water at the coxswain's side. The proa ranged alongside the deserted schooner, and the Malays swarmed upon her with a yell of triumph which sounded in Somers' ears like a knell of doom; for, with the schooner lost, he knew all was lost.

He had already started down the beach to meet the whaleboat; but Thorsen passed him with the rush and growl of an infuriated grizzly. When the Malay spear flashed in the sunlight, the big man, in a rage, flung up his rifle and poured shot after shot at the enemy.

"The fiends have got my ship," Thorsen shouted, "but the whaleboat's got clear, thank Heaven! The proa can't follow her into shallow water, and if those black scoundrels come ashore again—" He broke off with a cry of anger. "Oh, what fools we've been! Don't you see? That attack back there from the bush was only a blind, a lure to get me from my ship and give the proa time to get round the end of the island and jump the schooner. They knew my Fiji boys wouldn't fight, even if they had arms."

The whaleboat, spinning up the channel with the speed of fear, turned into the lagoon. Thorsen sprang out into the shallows and swept up the lithe little figure from the stern like a feather in his great arm. The next moment Lieutenant George Somers was looking into Maida's startled blue eyes. The girl's glance fell upon the mutilated navy jacket, and she checked a sharp cry.

"It is true then," she said breathlessly, "about—what they told me?"

Somers stood like a doomed man awaiting sentence. Without a word she turned away to her father.

"I brought your pistol along, Dad," she said, a little quaver in her voice. "I made one of the boys fetch it from the cabin, and wouldn't take him off till he did. Did you see them try to spear me? Oh! I only wish they had!"

The low voiced cry went to Somers' heart; but a growl from Thorsen stopped him, as he impulsively took a step toward the girl.

"I wish he'd brought the big Mauser rifle in the cabin!" Thorsen was saying. "I'd make those ship stealers think a Gatling gun was after them!"

SOMERS straightened up and drew in his breath sharply. In his brain a sudden inspiration developed with Thorsen's words—an inspiration that meant the wiping out of his debt to Thorsen and the salvation of them all, if he succeeded.

"We've got to recapture that schooner before the Malays burn her or the monsoon breaks her back on the rocks!" he said to Thorsen.

The girl stood a little apart, gazing at the black clouds rolling in from the ocean, and Somers spoke in his quarterdeck tone.

"There's no chance of those black fellows coming ashore after us; they know the gunboats would catch 'em in the end; but, man, you're trapped here! You have to get away!"

"You're in a hurry to wipe out your debt to me, Lieutenant!" Thorsen said with a flash of his white teeth. "It's a big order, and there is the girl to think of."

"That's just what I am thinking of," Somers retorted roughly. "You'll find it a big order all around, if the gunboats catch you on this island. You spoke of a Mauser rifle hidden aboard. I have a service pistol back in my shack in the woods. The fog will be over the channel presently. I can drop down to the ship and do the job before they know how many are in it. You can hold off with the whaleboat, ready to run or come, depending on who takes the other, the Malays or me."

Thorsen laced his beard with his big fingers. "It might be done; a surprise is half the battle. You've seen the schooner's build," he said. "She has big stern ports, windows big enough for a man clawing up the rudder chains into the cabin. The bookcase swings out. There's a big caliber Mauser repeater back of it, and a dozen packets of cartridges—"

"The fog will shut down over the channel in a minute," Somers said. "Call in your boat!"

"You can't count on my Fiji boys to help you at a pinch," Thorsen said. "I have to stay with the girl."

revolver. "The commander of the Buffalo would hang Thorsen at the yardarm right before her, if he had his way. As for me—" he shrugged his shoulders.

The whaleboat pushed out into midchannel and dropped down with the tide, the Fiji sailors crouching with ready oars on the thwarts, the girl snuggling in the sternsheets beside Thorsen. Somers, peering into the mist that obscured the anchored schooner, saw a vague outline down stream and slipped out of his jacket.

"That's far enough! I can make her out now," he said to Thorsen. "The tide race will carry me down to her."

He kicked off his shoes and paused irresolutely, his hand on his hip.

"Take your pistol along. I have mine and a rifle besides," Thorsen said. "And you'd better hold out one cartridge for eventualities."

For a second the eyes of the two men met. Somers had fought predatory Malays before. Out of the gathering fog and the smother down the channel a menacing chorus welled over the waters. Somers laid his hand on the gunwale, ready to vault over the side.

"If you do make the cabin," Thorsen said, "the Mauser will sweep the deck."

Somers was already over the side of the whaleboat. For an instant he clung to the boat, getting his bearings. He heard a little sob and a murmur and something caressingly light as a feather passed over the back of his hand. Then he struck out for the schooner.

"God speed!"

OMINOUS splashes came from the lagoon; the yells of the Malays grew louder; but Somers' heart was light in memory of that last whispered wish. A tar bucket, blazing on the forward deck of the schooner, threw a red glare on the waters beyond him. Somers rounded the stern, reached the hanging rudder chain in two strong strokes, and hung on despite the give of the chain and the clutch of the strong tide.

It was no trick for a sailor to reach the cabin windows, flung open to the tropical air. Somers crawled into the open port. Head and shoulders through he paused, his hands on the sill, the sea water dripping from his hair, and the glare of the fire on his face. From where he rested, looking across the empty cabin through the forward window, he saw round the blazing tar bucket on deck a score of natives in savage revel. Then, within touch of his hand, a black bulk rose before him and two goggling white eyes glared into his own.

In a sharp drawn breath of surprise he saw the man's jaw drop and the double row of white pointed teeth flash in the black face. Before he could jerk his hand back to his revolver, the native fled shrieking up the companionway.

"The fat is in the fire now!"

"Bewitched! Bewitched!"

The cry of terror stilled the tumult on deck; but Somers knew the panic of the superstitious savages would not last. He was in the cabin while the shouts still rang out, and had drawn Thorsen's heavy Mauser from its secret cache behind the bookcase. Through the front windows he had a vision of black goggling figures coming toward him, a forest of curved knives, laced with flame from the blazing tar bucket. Somers dropped in a clip of cartridges, then dropped the rifle on the window sill and emptied the Mauser over the deck, firing without even aiming.

"I'll teach you to ball up my plans and try to murder an American girl!" he snarled. He cuddled the stock to pick off the raiding party with the precision of a marksman. At the same moment cries of alarm supplemented the howls of terror on deck. He saw the Malays leaping into the proa and chopping frantically at the mooring lines. The schooner's deck was clear and the proa swept past on the tide rush.

"Cut loose the anchor! There's no time to haul it up! Hoist the sails!"

It was Thorsen's blaring voice, and Thorsen's big form sprang over the side. Somers, amazed at the turn of events, saw him snatch up a discarded hatchet and rush forward into the bows. Copper colored bodies of the Fiji sailors supplanted the Malays on deck, the head sails went up with a rush, and the schooner, rearing from her parted moorings like a restive horse, turned in her own length and fled out of the channel on the heels of the Malay proa. Then Fate struck once more, and Somers understood the panic of the natives and the sudden advent of Thorsen.

JUST outside the reef, a high sided white steamer, the sparks shooting from her yellow stacks, under forced draft, marked time with the flying schooner. On her bridge a battery of glasses was trained on

Continued on page 17

Catching Thorsen Across the Back and Tossing Him Far Into the Breakers.

M. LEONE
DRAWER

"Call in your boat!" Somers spun on his heel. "And the lagoon is full of sharks for a swimmer—" Somers was already in the bush. Thorsen looked after him, grimly smiling.

"A coward who quit under fire!" he said and laughed. "I only wish I had a dozen like him on my ship."

WHATEVER may have happened in the immediate or distant past, it was not in Lieutenant Somers' mind just then to measure chances in the face of imminent action. He only remembered that Maida, his Manila Maida, stood in danger of death and, should a prowling gunboat show up inopportunely, of worse than death.

"I simply must get them off the island," he told himself, as he hurried back, strapping on his precious original. King Edward is reported to have pointed out to George Edwards, shortly before the London production, that "The Merry Widow" was a happier translation of "Die Lustige Witwe" than the title then announced, "The Jolly Widow." The Viennese "Heisses Blut" has succeeded in two versions in this country, "A Dangerous Maid" and "The Rollicking Girl," both of which may be said to have, in a way, retained some of the spirit of the original title without being at all "Hot Blood."

Twisting Titles Into Smiles

Continued from page 9

We get a glimpse of the reverse side of this difficulty in translation on the German stage, where the Oscar Wilde plays are very popular. Perhaps the best liked is the fantastic farce with the punning title of "The Importance of Being Earnest," which is known on the German stage as "Bunbury." Bunbury, you may recall, is the name the hero—"Ernest in town and Jack in the country"—has given to his imaginary friend to whose bedside he is invariably called when he wishes to sidestep an unpleasant duty.

Bunbury is not the only imaginary man whose name is used as the title of a play. There is "Sir Anthony," the baronet the little cockney snob invented to boast of as a friend, in the Haddon Chambers farce; just as Miss Annie Russell used to keep off overardent suitors by pretending to be the wife of "The Mysterious Mr. Bugle." And of course you recall that the point of the famous Hoyt farce was that the gay San Franciscans really were going to a masked ball at the Cliff House when they announced themselves as bound on "A Trip to China-town."

When the delightful satirical comedy of "A Royal Family" was announced for production Queen Victoria indirectly requested the author to change the title. She did not demand it, and Captain Marshall did not comply. But see how much more influential a department store is than a Queen! A musical farce was put into rehearsal under the name of "The Girl from Jay's." Now, Jay's is a large shop in London. One might suppose the proprietors pleased with the advertisement. Nevertheless, they themselves requested the title changed. The manager refused. Then the Jay firm threatened a libel suit, pointing out that the farce represented a girl in their employ as no better than she ought to be. Thus it was that London—and our country—came to know and enjoy the play as "The Girl from Kay's."

Not a few amusing distortions of familiar titles are unknown to the general public because the burlesques they designated were acted privately. The Lambs Club usually prefers to contribute to the gaiety of its members rather than of nations. "Paid When Full," for example, speaks for itself. So does "What Every Woman Thinks She Knows." Anyone who saw "The First Gentleman of Europe," Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's drama about the wicked intrigues of the wickedest Prince of Wales, can smile at a title so good, though easy, as "The Worst Gentleman of Europe."

In that burlesque the late Edward Morgan played the same part he acted in the original drama at the Lyceum. And though all the other characters were caricatured, the heroic lines of his rôle were retained and he delivered them with intense sincerity. Charles Hawtrey did the same thing in London, as a friendly prank in a performance given by DeWolf Hopper and his American company. Mr. Hawtrey was Mrs. Langtry's leading actor in "The Degenerates"; so when Hopper caricatured her as the heroine Hawtrey added to the absurdity by soberly playing himself in the opposite rôle.

Many Lambs Club burlesques have found their way to the professional stage as interpolations in full length extravaganzas. Glen McDonough's "The Notorious Adventures of the Second Mrs. Brownsmith" was as laborious a title from the two Pinero plays as Clay M. Greene's "Sharp Becky" or "The Secret of Gillette's Service." But Mr. McDonough made a point in making fun of "Sporting Life" as "The Sporty Wife," because the scene he emphasized was the murder of the schenig, unfaithful wife.

It would be a futile bid for a smile to recall such jests, laborious yet puny, as "Thrillby" and "Cryis" and "Children of the Get-Dough." But people familiar with the original dramas don't need second sight to see the point of "The Great Decide" and of "The Darling of the Gallery Gods." And coming at the moment when Dr. Osler was the topic of general jest, "When We Are Forty-one" was a happy title for a burlesque on a roof garden. You disagree? Well, it was a very hot, humid New York summer and any breezy wheeze was welcome.

A decade or more ago three authors collaborated to turn out the libretto for one of those "Casino summer shows" which were for several years so popular. But too many cooks spoiled the froth. One of the authors was invited to withdraw. He retorted that if he did he would take what he had written with him. "You're welcome," was the answer. All he could find to remove was the title.

That was how it came about that the extravaganza announced as "The Mimic World" was presented as "The Merry World." The original title was used for a similar entertainment at the Casino some years later.

After a prolonged London success "Lady Madcap" became "My Lady's Maid" on the voyage over to our side, while "Little Christopher Columbus" lost its last name somewhere in the same sea. "The Grand Duchess of Gerolstein" and "The Drum Major's Daughter" were similarly clipped before achieving their successes on our side. Miss Paula Edwardes gave a good reason when she imported "Winsome Winnie Walker" for her use and bade the "Walker" walk away. "If there is any extra space on the billboards," she remarked, "I want it for my name, not Winnie Walker's."

I wonder what Miss Edwardes thought when E. H. Sothern ordered the drama written for him by Lawrence Irving announced as "The Fool Hath Said in His Heart There is No God."

An Officer and a Gentleman

Continued from page 5

Somers, standing beside the wheel; then came the sharp bark of a signal gun and the wail of the cruiser's siren, mingled with the roar of the coming storm.

"It's the Buffalo! And the monsoon is on us! Will you steer the schooner out? Quick, man!" Thorsen's fierce face glared into his own. "They'll not take me alive!"

Somers hesitated. The habit of navy discipline was still upon him. To him Thorsen was the outlaw, for whom the Buffalo had raked the seas. And here, with the cruiser upon them, was Somers' opportunity.

A channel of saffron light shot through the mist from the cruiser's bridge, flooding the group. Somers looked down at a white little figure clinging to the hatch. The sight of that forlorn little form battered down his last tenacity of purpose; with it went every thought of discipline, of the ultimate call of service and country.

He heard the clanging of the engine bell, the searchlight blinked, and the cruiser sheered off, heading into the blow. With a reckless, smothered cry, Somers sprang at the wheel, flashing defiance at the white ship.

"For the girl! Duty be hanged!"

The schooner passed the proa with the rush of a seagull before the wind. Thorsen, staring ahead, in the foreshrouds blared forth orders to the Fiji crew. At the wheel Somers glance wandered moodily over the tumbling ocean. The cruiser, disgrace everlasting, and a painted wall of coming blackness were behind him, and death threatened ahead! It was almost as if the cruiser, which had known him at his best, had come expressly to witness his final degradation. The channel mouth and the ocean opened; then with the howling of ambushed wolves the storm swooped down on them. The schooner's mainsail split and vanished like paper; under the pull of her foresails the little ship staggered, turned her head inshore, and fled down the rock strewn coast like a runaway horse.

"We're done for, Lieutenant! She's taken the bit in her teeth, and she's making for the outlying reefs! It was only a chance, after all," Dane Thorsen stood calmly beside him, his big hand resting on the helpless wheel. "We can't work her with the mainsail gone, and the cruiser's after us," he added significantly. "Well, Lieutenant?"

YOU know what you have to expect when the Buffalo takes us off?" Somers' tone was contemptuously incisive. "If you don't happen to know it, I can tell you I was waiting for you on that island. The disgrace and all that was simply a trick to catch you."

"Anyway, I know it now, to catch me or

Now try a talcum that is light and "fluffy"—free from greasiness—and do so at our expense by dropping a postal for free sample of

LEHN & FINK'S
Riveris Talcum
White and Flesh Tint

This highly refined and exquisitely perfumed powder has taught American women the luxury of a talcum that cools, refreshes and heals—one that destroys perspiration odors—one so fine that it blends with the skin and does not leave a gloss. Just why it is the daintiest and most improved of powders you cannot appreciate until you or buy from your druggist. Extra large bronze-covered sprinkle top jars, 25c.

Send for Free Sample

LEHN & FINK, 127 William St., New York
Ask your Dentist about Pebecco Tooth Paste

Hammo-port
TRADE MARK

No need to pay the high price of couch or bed hammocks. The improved 1910 Hammo-port is better in every way—less expensive. Back rest adjustable to any position, use as a wind shield or back rest. The patent spring cannot sag and will support 450 lbs. Use as a hammock or bed for outdoor sleeping. Solid colors and handsome stripes, positively fast colors. Guaranteed satisfactory or money back. Buy from your dealer or we will ship complete east of Rockies for $9.75. Ask for booklet H, FREE.

Carnie-Goudie Mfg. Co.
Kansas City, Missouri

In Hot Weather
Be Cool—Be Comfortable

Take off your vest or coat and vest and your suspenders will not be seen if you wear

Crown Make
"COATLESS" SUSPENDERS

Under the overshirt—Over the undershirt—Always invisible—Easy to put on and take off.

50 Cents a Pair

At your dealer's or sent prepaid on receipt of price.
Crown Suspender Co., Dept. A-836 Bway., N. Y.
The genuine are stamped "Coatless," (Pat. 7-4-05).

Cut Out and Mail this Coupon Today

Name _____
Address _____

RICHMOND SALES CO.,
Dept. 5, 160 Broadway, N. Y.

I would like to have a "RICHMOND" Electric Suction Cleaner demonstrated in my home, provided it places me under no obligation whatever

A Postage Stamp Puts the "RICHMOND" Suction Cleaner In Your Home

You see here an Electric Suction Cleaner which weighs but 10 lbs., instead of 60. You can use The "RICHMOND" with or without the hose attachment. The every day work of rug and carpet cleaning, of cleaning hardwood floors, tile floors, hearths, bathrooms, porches can be done with or without the hose attachment. Slip on the hose attachment and The "RICHMOND" with its six special cleaning tools, all furnished without extra cost, cleans hangings, walls, books, bedding, upholstery, clothing hats, underneath radiators, furniture, etc.

Only Really Portable Cleaner

You can do the daily cleaning in less than one-half the time required when you use a broom, carpet-sweeper and duster. And there is no dust. A child can carry the "RICHMOND" from room to room—up and down stairs. There is nothing about it to get out of order—it operates on any ordinary electric light socket at a cost of a little over a cent an hour. Absolutely guaranteed and you can try it in your own home—without obligation. Simply sign and mail the coupon shown above. Also ask for handsome illustrated book.

MANUFACTURED BY THE
McCRUM-HOWELL CO.,
FOR

THE RICHMOND SALES CO.,
Dept. 5, 160 Broadway, NEW YORK
To whom all correspondence should be addressed spells "Danger" when blown against any other than an electric light.

Keep your windows open—let the breezes in—and still avoid fire risk by lighting your home with

General Electric
Mazda Lamps

They rival the sun in light—and shame it by keeping cool.

They do not heat the air nor consume its oxygen.

They give a light that is comfortable, healthful and safe.

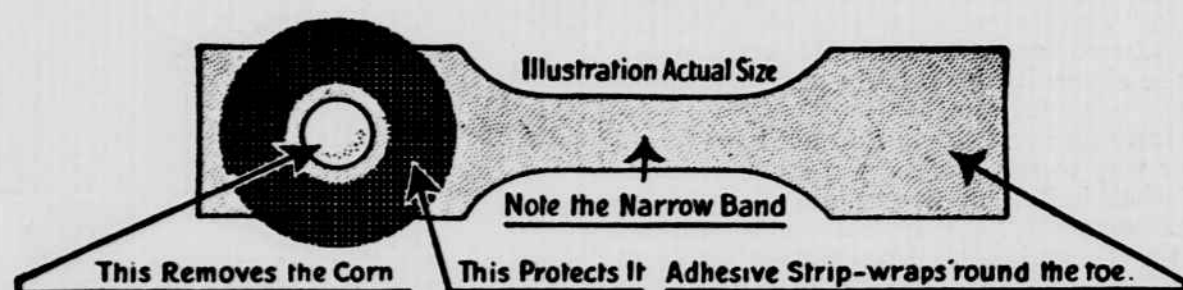

"The Dawn of a New Era in Lighting" tells why G-E Mazda Lamps have cut in two the former cost of Electric lighting. If your lighting company's supply of this booklet is exhausted, write us for it.

Meanwhile, telephone your lighting company for enough G-E Mazda Lamps to try in your home. If your house isn't wired already, you will be agreeably surprised to learn how easily and economically it can be done now.

Your electric light man knows—ask him.

GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY
Dept. 32 SCHENECTADY, N. Y.

Corns Gone in 48 Hours

Such is the fame of Blue-jay Corn Plasters that more than 10,000 are sold every day. That is, by forty-five times, the largest sale in the world.

The reason is the effect of Blue-jay. A downy felt ring instantly stops all the chafing and pain. At the same time a wonderful medication begins disengaging the corn.

In 48 hours you merely lift the corn out.

Unfailing. Painless. Perfectly safe. No spreading liquid to cause soreness. No untidy salve.

Neat, simple, convenient—nothing else like it. It has done this for millions. It will do it for you.

Get a package today of a druggist.

Prove, if you wish, before you buy, all that we claim for Blue-jay. Just ask us and we'll send a sample—free.

Blue-jay

15c and 25c
per Package

Also Blue-jay
Bunion Plasters

Corn Plasters

(55)

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York—Makers of Surgical Dressings, Etc.

DENT'S Toothache Gum

A Small Affair. not only stops toothache instantly, but cleans the cavity, removes all odor, and prevents decay. Keep a supply, and save many a dentist bill. There are imitations. See that you get Dent's Toothache Gum. At all druggists 15 cents, or by mail. Dent's Corn Gum cures corns and bunions, 15c. C. S. Dent & Co. 60 Larned St., Detroit, Mich.

Bunions INSTANTLY RELIEVED

and lasting comfort guaranteed by using THE FISHER BUNION PROTECTOR. It reduces swelling, stops friction and irritation and keeps the shoes in shape. Over 250,000 sufferers benefited. FREE TRIAL. We will send this sure Bunion Relief on 10 Days' Trial. No pay if it fails. Send size of shoes and if for right or left foot. THE FISHER MFG. CO., 923 34 St., Milwaukee, Wis.

Send on Approval. Send No Money. $2.00. WE WILL TRUST YOU TEN DAYS. Hair Switch. Send a lock of your hair, and we will mail a 22 inch short stem fine human hair switch to match. If you find it a big bargain, remit $2.00 in ten days, or sell 3 and GET YOUR SWITCH FREE. Extra shades a little more. Inclose 5c postage. Free beauty book showing latest style of hair dressing—also high grade switches, pompadours, wigs, puffs, etc. ANNA AVENUE, Dept. 71 19 Quincy St. Chicago creates a sun- and wind-proof complexion. Price 50c at all dealers or by mail. Sample of Kosmeo Cream, Kosmeo Face Powder and 64-page book on the complexion and hair sent free. Address Mrs. Gervase Graham, 1484 Michigan Ave., Chicago.

KOSMEO CREAM

CORNS

That troublesome corn you couldn't get rid of can be removed without cutting or danger of blood-poison. Just use A-Corn Salve. 15 cents at druggists or by mail. Giant Chemical Co., Philadelphia

LAME PEOPLE

The Perfection Extension Shoe for any person with one short limb. Worn with any style of ready-made shoes with perfect ease and comfort. Shipped on trial. Write for booklet. HENRY D. LUTZ, 813 Third Avenue, New York City

WIGS and TOUPEES

Absolutely non-detectable toupees—best in the world. Sent on approval. Recommended by physicians. Catalogue Free. Lombard, Bannan Co., 495 Washington St., Lynn, Mass.

Hay Fever and Asthma

Sufferers from these two afflictions can be greatly relieved by the use of a little device which we will send to any address to be tested 7 days before you decide to keep it.

This device filters the air. The dust, pollen and other foreign matter, which produce irritation that causes Hay Fever and the paroxysms of Asthma, are eliminated. Relief is immediate. The delicate membranes of the nasal cavities are rested and protected so that the affected parts have an opportunity to regain their normal powers of resistance. This device is not a cure, but it gives relief instantly. Thousands are in use. They are not annoying and cannot be seen when worn.

Send name and address so that we may let you have a 7 days' test of this little device. The Nasal-filter Company, 431 Globe Bldg., St. Paul, Minn.

"SAVE THE HORSE" SPAVIN CURE

REG. TRADE MARK

Easton, Pa., 5-23-10. I have just purchased a bottle of A. J. Odenweller's "Save The Horse" for I cured one rhinoceros of three years' standing and one spavin with one bottle. I will now try it on a strained ankle of four months' standing. Yours truly, L. F. HUSTED, R. D. No. 6, Box 20, 227 Arctic St., Bridgeport, Conn., Jan. 6, 1910.

Please send me one bottle "Save The Horse" at once. I treated a mare for bone spavin which defied all other treatment. I am very glad to write you she is completely cured and has been going sound ever since. A great remedy is "Save The Horse," and you deserve all the success you are having. J. M. TERRILL.

$5.00 a bottle, with legal written guarantee or contract. Send for copy, booklet and letters from business men and trainers on every kind of case. Permanently cures Spavin, Thoroughpin, Ringbone (except low), Curb, Splint, Capped Hock, Wind-puff, Shoe Blist, Injured Tendons and all Lameness. No scar or loss of hair. Horse works as usual. Dealers or Express Paid. Troy Chemical Company, 111 Commercial Ave., Hinghamton, N. Y.

Darken Your Gray Hair

DUBY'S HAIR COLORING HERBS restore gray, streaked or faded hair to its natural color, beauty and softness. Prevents the hair from falling out, promotes its growth, prevents dandruff, and gives the hair a soft, glossy and healthy appearance. It will not stain the scalp, is not sticky or dirty, and is composed of roots, herbs, barks and flowers. Package makes one pint. It will produce the most luxuriant tresses from dry, coarse and wiry hair, and bring back the color it originally was before it turned gray. Package postpaid for 25 cents, or five packages for $1.00. OZARK HERB CO., Desk G, St. Louis, Mo.

U. S. METAL POLISH

Indispensable in Every Household 3 oz. Box 10c. At Your Dealers or Geo. W. Hoffman, Indianapolis, Ind.

The Berkshire Hills Sanatorium

For the Scientific and Effective Treatment of CANCER

Without Resorting to Surgical Procedure

The only private institution of magnitude in the United States for the exclusive treatment of Cancer and other malignant and benign new growths. Conducted by a physician of standing. Established thirty-two years. For complete information address Berkshire Hills Sanatorium, North Adams, Massachusetts others like me who might happen along. I came first, that's all." Thorsen stroked his red beard.

Somers had no sympathy for the man; but with destruction ahead he burned to justify himself in Thorsen's eyes—and so in the eyes of the girl he had tried to save. He went on steadily. "You had run your course, and the commander was bound to take you. We planned it all, the court martial, my dismissal from the ship, and the marooning, to that one end—and that cowardice thing." Somers winced.

Thorsen threw back his head with his deep chested laugh. "I can guess that. By Thor! that old gray fox astern of us wanted me badly to set that mousetrap, with you for bait! That must have grinded the soul of an officer and a gentleman."

"I acted under orders!" Somers retorted hotly. "The Buffalo couldn't catch you, and I meant to do it single handed, if I had to wait six months."

"But the Fates intervened. Well, the commander guessed right. Sooner or later I should have passed the island, even if I had not been looking for you. I should have taken you off for my own selfish reasons. And now," Thorsen said with a grim laugh, "you turn traitor and help the pirate to escape! And, by heaven! I believe we'll make it yet."

The schooner, out of control of the wheelman, was racing before the storm, threading the deep sea lanes like a sentient creature. The cruiser, a mile away, followed doggedly in her wake. Somers knew the gray old officer who commanded her. Despite a thousand monsoons, he would follow to the bitter end indeed—for Thorsen, for him, for the girl.

A SHOUT from Thorsen as the giant sprang forward recalled him to the peril at hand. The red reef rocks rose out of the mists like a belated danger signal. He saw Thorsen leap to the sheet ropes and cast loose the foresail.

"Luff, man! Luff up, for your life!"

Thorsen's wild call reached him through the thrashing of the sail and the whine of the following wind. A great sea washing under the schooner lifted the little craft high in the air. When she dropped it was with the booming sound of a turret gun. On the breast of the storm Somers saw the white sided cruiser flash past, swing round in a semicircle to the seas, and head up to the wreck. His eyes were caught on a string of signal flags streaming from the watchful warship again marking time in sight of her prey.

"Drop down to us in the boat," he read aloud. "We'll pick you up." He swung on Thorsen inquiringly.

The big man was already hauling in the painter of the whaleboat over the stern. He motioned to the native sailors, clustering aft. The Fijis went over the side like bronze automatons.

"If the cruiser's boats can't live in this sea, mine can, and my boys will take her through anything!" Thorsen said. He shot a glance at the distant island and the tumbling waste of waters between and shook his head. "It's no good!" he said grimly. "Go over, and I'll hand her down."

For an instant the young officer hung back irresolute, his eyes on the frail figure that clung to Thorsen. He knew the giant freebooter was facing death, or worse than death to a man like him. If there lurked in his mind a vague hope of escape, Somers realized how vain that hope must be. Then he recalled the look in Thorsen's gray eyes whenever they rested on the girl, a look of yearning and dawning hope.

"Get over!" Thorsen said impatiently. "Man, it's coming again! Those monsoons travel in a circle. The ship can't stand another such flaying as the last—and it is well!"

A breath like a sob checked the reckless laugh that accompanied the last words. Thorsen caught up the form of his daughter in his great arms. The Fiji boatmen, bright eyed and confident in their own familiar element, awaited their master with outboarded oars. The swirl of running waters under the schooner's stern clutched the whaleboat, striving to tear it away from the rope that held it. Somers saw Thorsen's leonine head turned with a scowl of defiance at the watchful warship.

Thorsen swung up the girl, crushing her to him. Then he dropped her into Somers' waiting arms. "Take her!" he said. Overhead a knife flashed on the straining rope, and Thorsen, standing upright with folded arms, watched the whaleboat as it spun away from the schooner like a feather on the sea. Over his head the mainboom thrashed and groaned like the threat of doom.

The cries of the Fiji sailors mingled with the moaning of the wind as they swung the boat round, vainly striving to make headway against the storm. At the schooner's rail Thorsen watched, peering under his curved hand. A towering wave bore down on the wrecked schooner as she lifted and dropped on the rocks, and careened her over on her side with an ominous sound of grinding timbers.

The wave passed and struck the whaleboat, burying it in a smother of foam. When its force had spent itself, they saw Thorsen on the top of the cabin, still anxiously peering after the boat. When the whaleboat lifted again on the crest of the waves Thorsen raised himself on the sloping cabin roof, with a gesture of thankfulness to heaven. The schooner lurched back again. The main boom poised for an instant suspended in midair, then swooped down like a giant's flail, catching Thorsen fair across the back and tossing his body far into the breakers. On the rocks the wrecked schooner fell apart like a house of cards.

"A death for a brave man to die!" So spoke the stroke oar softly.

Somers looked moodily down at the helpless burden in his arms. Mercifully the viking's daughter had been spared the sight of that last tragedy, and Somers thought, with a sudden wave of thankfulness, that she would also be spared the unveiling of her father's real character.

UNDER the lee of the waiting warship a hundred eager hands were stretched out to draw her from the boat. On the deck of the cruiser Somers marched straight up to the commander, saluting.

"Report myself on board, sir," he said. "And under arrest!"

"For running out the pirate? H'm!" The commander listened in silence, and it did not occur to Somers to palliate his intentions. "And capturing the girl?" A light twinkled in the old sea dog's eyes when Somers had finished. He as well as the watching officers had seen the pale, pretty face of Thorsen's daughter. "I swore to take Thorsen alive or dead, didn't I?" he demanded. "And he's dead, isn't he? Lieutenant Somers," he said in a voice that carried over the deck of the ship, "return to duty with the thanks of your commander! The monsoon may hit again," the commander chuckled. "We all have to look out for monsoons, on sea or shore. Besides, you'll look better in stars and buttons."

Somers did not smile. The Fates had struck again, and he did not question their judgment. But he was thinking of the boatman's epitaph, "So brave men die!" And he remembered Thorsen's last look, the look that had commended the viking's daughter to him.

PLAYING UPON AN APE

THE superintendent of a Western zoological institution has taught his employees to manage animals by indirect methods, akin to those by which nervous children are controlled by wise parents. A rhinoceros had an abscess in its face. The question was, Did it come from a bad tooth, or did it only need lancing? The superintendent simply said to the keeper, "Give him a new birch broom." The rhinoceros at once ate it, grinding up the bits with great gusto. "Ah! You see his teeth are all right," said the superintendent, and the next day the abscess was lanced with a sharp bill hook.

The diagnosis was as ingenious as his method of managing Billy, a refractory chimpanzee. The big ape needed exercise. This he obtained by being allowed the run of the large monkey house, instead of remaining in a side room before the visitors came. As he knew he would be caught and put back into his own compartment at this hour, the ape used to climb to the top of the other monkeys' cages and refuse to come down.

As he could not be tempted with food, the superintendent appealed to his mind by working on what he had noted to be his weak points, curiosity and cowardice.

The superintendent went to the keeper and, touching him gently on the shoulder, directed his attention in a mysterious manner to the dark passage underneath the gas pipe that traverses the house, pretending to point out some horrible unknown creature, using an energetic manner, but saying nothing except words to this effect, "Look out! There he is! There he is!" At the same time the two men would peer into the dark place under the gas pipe.

The monkey, on such occasions, would come down to see what the subject of fear and interest was, and just then the superintendent and the keeper in unison would shout, "He's coming out! He's coming out!" and would rush away in the direction of Billy's cage. The monkey would dash for the same place of safety, which happened to be the door of his own house, and sometimes enter it before them.

The monkey has never learned the deception; but is taken in by it whenever the time comes to finish his morning's airing.